Justification

As part of its successful application for the only National Resource Center Title VI Grant at UGA, The Latin American and Caribbean Studies Institute initiated its Quechua language Program in 2014. Along with Portuguese (which currently offers a minor), Quechua is one of two less-commonly taught languages that qualify for Foreign Language and Area Studies Fellowships through the NRC Grant, both for academic year and summer study.

A few peer and aspirational universities currently offer varying levels of Quechua language instruction (UCLA, U. Penn, Michigan, NYU, Illinois, Pittsburgh, Utah), though to our knowledge, UGA would be the first institution to offer a Quechua minor.

Multiple students have expressed interest in the minor as a motivation for enrolling and continuing with the language, as it would offer a means to officially document their linguistic and cultural competency. We therefore believe the minor will additionally help draw attention to the language, highlight resources such as the FLAS opportunity for institutional and tuition support, and increase recruitment.

As an institute whose reach spans across campus and academic disciplines, LACS comprises core and affiliate faculty with cultural, political, and scientific expertise in Andean and indigenous studies as well as Latin American and Caribbean research. The minor will offer students who pursue training in this area a credential that will especially complement their scholarship and enhances their marketability to employers who work with emerging sectors across the region.
